Lev Rubinstein : Here I Am (New Russian Writing) before purchasing it in order to gage whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised Here I Am (New Russian Writing):

Rubinstein succeeds in arranging his fragmented text in such a clever way that they invariably trigger off a series of associations, even in the reader who fails to catch all the allusions weaved in by the author. Thus his texts begin to speak to any reader anywhere and in any language, but they speak in a different way.

"These monologic poets (Rubinstein in particular) parody what might be called the idiocy of daily life by treating this idiocy as something incredibly serious and important. They seem to be writing a kind of personal and sociological mythology. In their more complex gestures to bracket mass culture in ironic and parodic terms, they can be likened to some of the poets of the New York School and pop artists like Andy Warhol and Roy Lichtenstein." --Andrew Wachtel, NWU
