There are two to four pages devoted to each trail with information concerning length, difficulty, GPS coordinates and driving directions to the parking area, how to access the trail from the lot, and very detailed points of interest and advisories to keep in mind throughout the trail. Therefore, it's a very concise, interesting, and valuable resource for anyone hoping to explore the North Shore, the Superior Hiking Trail (SHT), and the Superior National Forest. The author is a good writer as well. Stylistically it's a very enjoyable read. Every Midwest outdoorsman should have this book. Trust me.

This one along with Gentle Hikes - were the best in preparing for our trip. We are in our 40s and 50s with only minimal to moderate experience and some health and stamina considerations. I know we are going to have a fabulous trip. Thanks to those who take the time to document nature's beauty and the best ways to access it.

About the Author Andrew Slade's parents first set eyes on each other on Minnesota's North Shore of Lake Superior, and Andrew's life has centered there since birth despite growing up in the Twin Cities. As a kid, he caught nets full of smelt at the Cross River, jumped cliffs into the deep pools of an unnamed North Shore river, helped to band woodcock in the open fields of North Shore homesteads, and shut his eyes tight each time the family wagon drove around Silver Cliff (today there's a tunnel through the cliff and his eyes stay wide open). With his intrepid father, he had to abandon a mid-1970s assault on Carlton Peak due to a lack of recognizable trails. As a canoe guide and outdoor educator in Ely, he learned that sauna is a three-syllable word (sow-oo-h-nah). In his twenties, he bushwhacked by snowshoe much of what is now the Manitou-Caribou section of the Superior Hiking Trail. At age 28, in his before-kids era, he was the editor and lead author of the first Guide to the Superior Hiking Trail. Slade graduated from the University of Minnesota with a BA in environmental education and from the University of Montana with a MS in environmental studies. His favorite wildflower is Mertensia paniculata, the native North Shore bluebell. Andrew has worked for environmental education and preservation organizations on the North Shore since 1992.
