W.J. Yenne With a Foreword by George Ostrom During his half-century career, William J. Yenne was well known on the trails in the rugged backcountry of the American West, from Grand Canyon to the Idaho Panhandle. He was especially recognized as the most accomplished and knowledgeable outdoorsman who ever rode the back country of Montana's Glacier National Park. Mel Ruder, the Pulitzer Prize winning founder of the Hungry Horse News, who accompanied W.J. Yenne on many of his back country inspection tours, called him "the man who best knows Glacier National Park's one thousand miles of trails." Indeed, his work for the National Park Service took him on virtually every trail in Glacier, nearly every year throughout the 1950s and 1960s. He knew each mile of those trails intimately, and could identify every mountain peak and every glacier at a glance. He was also a renowned storyteller. Those who remember him, recall him both for travels shared in the Glacier back country, and for his amusing and fascinating yarns, spun around campfires and kitchen tables, many of which are preserved in this book. Mel Ruder described him as having "the lean look of a man who spends many hours in the saddle. A good outdoorsman, he presents the clean-shaven scrubbed look. His physical condition is better than many men half his age, and his dedication to Glacier's trails, a wonder to behold." There's tremendous regard for Bill Yenne in and around Glacier National Park. He's had long identity with Glacier, and no man knows trails in this great trail park better than Bill. As the local newspaper editor from 1946 to 1978 I saw his excellent supervision of Glacier's trail program and crews. He was a "dad-figure" and expert horseman who knew back country problems, how to serve visitors, and work with young men as well as back country oldsters. --Mel Ruder Pulitzer Prize winning founder of the Hungry Horse News, Columbia Falls, Montana
